FRENCH VIEW

EXCEPTIONAL PROPERTIES IN FRANCE
A warm welcome to the 2016 edition of Knight Frank’s French View featuring a handpicked selection of properties currently for sale throughout our network, as well as news and views from across France.

Since our 2015 publication, we have seen a notable turnaround in the French property market bringing about an impressive increase in transactions and, in certain locations, a modest uptick in prices. This activity has continued into 2016 and whilst there was a marginal (and somewhat expected) slowdown leading up to the British EU referendum, trading figures from across the network remain robust and the mood optimistic. Whilst it may be too early to forecast the ramifications of a British exit, the response among both buyers and sellers has been resilient with little fallout in the immediate aftermath of the referendum. International demand continues unabated including a significant number of British buyers who – despite Sterling’s temporary weakness – recognise that France’s appeal far outweighs any potential currency or political risk.

This year, we have also seen the opening of four new offices across the French network including Cannes and the Alpine villages of Val d’Isère, Méribel Village, and Courchevel Village. Bringing the total number of member offices to 21. These recent additions to our existing coverage of Paris, Provence, the Var, the Côte d’Azur, Gascony and the Alps underpin Knight Frank’s on-going commitment to the French real estate market. Alongside our dedicated London team, we are determined to remain the international agent of choice delivering a supreme level of service and expertise unsurpassed in the market today.

We are particularly grateful to Frédéric Rouzaud, the CEO of Louis Roederer Champagne, and Alain Passard, founder of Arpège in Paris, for their gracious contribution to our editorial features; both men are venerated in their respective fields and share a deep rooted passion for the land and produce that clearly defines them. We thank them both for their enlightening insights and accepting our invitation to be interviewed.

We do hope you enjoy this year’s edition and look forward to helping you on the sale or purchase of a property in France.
INTERVIEW WITH
Frédéric Rouzaud,
CEO OF ROEDERER

As the seventh generation of his family to run the world-famous Louis Roederer champagne house, Frédéric Rouzaud has spent a life immersed in bubbles. Rouzaud, the company’s 49-year-old CEO, grew up playing hide and seek among the vines of the family’s estate in Reims, home to many of France’s biggest champagne houses.

After he graduated from the Paris Dauphine University, joining the family business immediately was out of the question – for all concerned. “There is an unspoken rule in my family that it’s better to work elsewhere for at least a few years. In any case, I didn’t want to work with my father when I was 22,” says Rouzaud.

Instead, he went to work as a trader for Auguste Thouard estate agency in their vineyards department. “It was one of the biggest estate agencies in France and I learnt a lot over these two or three years. I specialised in selling vineyards in Bordeaux and I sold two chateaux to my father – Deutz in 1993 and Chateau de Pez in 1995. Finally he was interested. I’d played a role in Roederer by selling him those chateaux and it was time for me to join the business,” he says.

And so Rouzaud rose the ranks over 20 years, becoming its managing director in 2006 – “My father decided to retire very young, at 63, and let me take over,” he explains – and its Chairman since last year.

Besides the 240 hectares that the company owns in Champagne – a region whose vineyards, wine cellars and sales houses were recently granted UNESCO World Heritage Site status – the family have expanded their empire to include the Bordeaux estates of Chateau de Pez, Chateau Haut-Beaureves and Chateau Pichon Longueville Comtesse. They also own Domaines Ott in Provence, Ramos Pinto in Portugal’s Douro Valley and a further 230 hectares in Northern California. “My father developed the Californian vineyard from scratch in the 1980s,” he says. “The idea is to build slowly a little federation of contemporary wine artisans around Louis Roederer.”

His job is “to manage – or try to manage – all of that,” says Rouzaud, who also adds family life to the mix as a father of three children, aged two, 11 and 14, with his wife Sophie. He travels constantly between all of Roederer’s estates – and acquiring a new one is invariably a delicate negotiation. “Each chateau has its own manager, which in some cases such as Domaines Ott is still the family who have owned the chateau for generations. When buying a chateau such as Pichon or Ott, it is a meeting between two families. It’s a very difficult decision for a family to sell those jewels, but they are happier to sell to a company that is like them – family-run, with a long history and a desire to improve the estate.”

Champagne may be a luxury item and big business – Louis Roederer exports three million bottles a year, including around 400,000 bottles of its legendary premium brand, Cristal, to 80 countries and the family’s worth is estimated at €700m – but it is also a business rooted in French history and heritage. Roederer celebrates its 140th anniversary this year, founded initially as Dubois Père & Fils before being taken over and renamed by Louis Roederer in 1833, when it became the official wine supplier to Tsar Nicholas II’s Imperial Court of Russia. Cristal was so-named because of the transparent and luminous lead-crystal bottle used to house the best cuvée reserved for the Tsar.

And perhaps it’s something of an oxymoron, but for Rouzaud this is also a business born out of passion – for the terroir and the landscapes and for striving to create the best champagne possible. Key to that is Roederer’s pride in being one of the only remaining family-run, independent champagne houses.
“Sometimes the decision I make isn’t the best one financially, but my family gave me the task of putting Louis Roederer in the best condition for the next 20 or 30 years, not to look only at the profits for the next three months,” he says. “If I decide the quality of the Cristal isn’t right, financially it’s not a good decision but for quality and the image of Cristal, it’s important for the long term.”

Being a family business enables them to bring a long-term vision to what they do, says Rouzaud. “If you want to produce the best wine in the world, you need time because good wine comes from great terroir. You need at least 20 years to get good grapes in a vineyard. That gives us time for creativity and time for research – and that’s important. If you have two financial guys looking over your shoulder, you’ll make mistakes. You’ll still produce a good wine but not the best.”

Undoubtedly the best part of his job, he says, is to be hands on with the wine production all year round: “Going into the vineyards, tasting the grapes at harvest and deciding the perfect day to pick them, then doing the blending after the harvest. The core of our soul and blood is to be behind the product. Our philosophy is to produce the top wine possible in every area we’ve invested in.

“We want to show the magic of the grape terroir through our range, whether it’s in our Cristal, the oldest of our grands crus, or our ‘entry level’ wines – though I hate that phrase – in which half the grapes come from our estate and half from the estates belonging to our select partners,” Rouzaud explains.

Roederer presented the fruits of a different kind of partnership recently, in its first new launch since its Cristal Rosé in 1974. Rouzaud teamed up with the French designer Philippe Starck to create a Brut Nature Millésime champagne. The 2006 vintage was launched in 2014 and the 2009 vintage is due to go on sale this September.

“Philippe loves champagne – he told me he was drinking a magnum a day with his wife – and he is a big fan of Brut Nature, which is a very small category of wine,” says Rouzaud. “He’s not a technician, so he wasn’t there every day tending it, but over the six years that we worked together, we had regular conversations and it was interesting to have this kind of discussion and to hear another vision.”

Through the Louis Roederer foundation, which supports contemporary artists, art plays an important role in Rouzaud’s working life. “We meet a lot of artists and we are interested in the process of creating art. It provides a bridge between them and our artisanal work,” he says. “For us, the artist in our job is nature. It gives us the colours and the raw materials and we try to interpret it with our wine. The artistic world is not so different from ours in some ways.”

He has no more celebrity collaborations in the horizon, but Rouzaud’s focus is firmly on the next vintage. “It’s always a work in process, seeking if possible to increase the quality and purity,” he says. “It’s impossible to say what makes Roederer unique as it is the sum of so many details. It’s a lot of work, but champagne is a great wine. The bubbles are one element, but the quality of the wine is so important before it becomes sparkling.”

You can’t help but wonder that if your work requires drinking champagne day in and day out, can it still seem special after all these years? Rouzaud is adamant that champagne still tastes “magical” to him. “I drink it every day for work but also for pleasure. If I didn’t still love it, I wouldn’t drink it.” And where would be the most magical place to drink it? “It’s not so much a place as who I would drink it with – friends and family who I am happy to share champagne with. The place is also important, though – an amazing view of a landscape from the middle of the vineyard.

To choose one of his vineyards above the others would be like having to choose a favourite child, however. “The estates are like babies. I share my time equally among them all and each of them is unique and magical,” he says.

Champagne can’t be produced anywhere else. Domaine Ott overlooks the Mediterranean Sea and the Porquerolles islands. Our Bordeaux vineyards have beautiful views of the Gironde, across places such as Pauillac and St-Julien. It’s a region that brings a specific climate of humidity and freshness that’s unlike anything else. When there, you feel the wine can only be good.”

In every wine he produces, he says, “there is a sense of place in every bottle”. And with that he is off to distil a little more of the essence of Reims for the delectation of champagne lovers around the world.

“We meet a lot of artists and we are interested in the process of creating art. It provides a bridge between them and our artisanal work.”
Opposite the Musée Rodin in Paris’s 7th arrondissement, an artist of a very different nature is at work. Alain Passard – the chef and owner of the three Michelin-star restaurant Arpège – is busy morning to night creating new dishes for the delectation of his diners.

He doesn’t limit his creativity to the kitchen, however, as Passard also owns the neighbouring art gallery, L’Arrière Cuisine, where he displays his own work, including collages and sculpture. What is immediately obvious when you see his the fruits of his imagination – whether on a plate or canvas – is that his passion lies in something that has traditionally been quite alien to carnivorous French culture: vegetables.

Passard has made vegetarian cooking fashionable. He was in New York recently and says vegetables are now back on the menu in the best restaurants. His à la carte dishes include beetroot sushi flavoured with geranium oil, celery tagliatelle with parmesan and thyme sauce and his most famous, for his apple rose tart, whose apple is twirled to resemble rose buds. His lunchtime tasting menu promises a stroll through the vegetable world – ‘une balade légumière’ - that will stimulate all the senses.

“Many things inspired me to focus on vegetarian cooking – the colours, the smells… I can make paintings and collages. That’s what I love about vegetables,” says Passard, who, this year, celebrates his 60th birthday, 30 years of Arpège and 20 years with three Michelin stars.

Seasonality is the key to his cooking, so besides the apple rose tart, he is reluctant to name any ‘signature’ dishes as nothing stays on his menu for long. “When I began as a chef, there was no respect for seasonality. Vegetables were of poor quality. I wanted to improve that,” he says. “Where I grew up in Brittany, I learnt from a young age to respect the seasons and nature and to only eat products that are organic. You don’t eat tomatoes or strawberries in winter. You need to have a respect for vegetables. They are a living thing and it’s a cuisine that always renews itself.”

Born in the small Breton town of La Guerche-de-Bretagne, Passard began his career at 14, working under the three Michelin-starred Breton chef Michel Kéréver at Le Lion d’Or in Liffré. At 21, he joined Alain Senderens at L’Archestrate (which Passard later bought and turned into Arpège – a name inspired by avid saxophone player Passard’s second passion: music). It was Senderens who taught him something he would take to heart: get out of the kitchen and look at what’s around you.

To read the menu at Arpège is to take a journey through the countryside of Northern France – Sarthe, Flandres, Morbihan. The provenance of every ingredient Passard uses in his restaurant (including the veal, lamb and volaille – as not all his dishes are vegetarian) is personally known to him.

He describes the feeling as he stands in his garden that overlooks Mont St Michel. “I feel an energy there. I rediscover the perfumes, the flavour and the light of my childhood. I love the sense of space, the softness and the silence. It’s a marvellous place for creativity.”

As you might expect from someone so inspired by nature, he is not impressed by distracting bling. The façade of Arpège is so discreet, you could walk past the building without realising it houses one of Paris’s most prestigious restaurants. Inside, with its 1930s Art Deco features, is similarly “sober”, says Passard. “I just want to focus on the essentials, which is the delicateness of the cuisine.”

For now, Arpège is his culinary focus. “I look no further than the bottom of the saucepan or the plate,” he replies when asked about the future. That’s just how he likes it. “I cook all the time – to relax and to inspire. It’s the best job in the world.”

Les Alpilles invokes a warm feeling in the heart of those who have witnessed first-hand its rugged exterior coupled with its accommodating nature. Recognised by the dramatic vistas granted by the mountain range that spans through the Parc Naturel, the landscape was established as an environmental piece de resistance in a series of oil paintings by Van Gogh. Yet beyond this fine backdrop is a finer charm that erupts from its bustling villages and towns, opening its arms to international guests, and cementing the region as a global sweetheart.

Occasionally, a property emerges that matches these celebrated qualities and perhaps surpasses them. With sharp lined interiors that echo the jagged massif, and elegant grounds that provide space to entertain your guests, this truly exceptional masterpiece takes glowing reviews from even the harshest of critics. Les Voiles de ST TROPEZ

by ZOE DARE HALL

ST TROPEZ has been synonymous with eye-catching glamour since the Fifties, ever since teenage screen siren Brigitte Bardot stole the limelight on Pampelonne beach and Club 55 became - and still is - the must go-to beach club for global jet-setters.

Every September, there is another reason to stop and stare in St Tropez and that’s during the week that Les Voiles de St Tropez comes to town. The world-famous sailing regatta, now in its 18th year, is a pivotal part of the yachting calendar, along with the likes of Antigua and Cowes.

Unlike any other regatta, though, it presents a unique opportunity for classic boats and modern super-yachts to compete together in a week of racing - and for their 4,000 or so crew members to let their hair down in the after-hours festivities.

This year’s event will see 350 boats take to the bay of St Tropez, their vast white sails set spectacularly against the backdrop of the village’s facades that take on a coppery glow in the Autumn light.

About half of the participants are classic boats, including some of the world’s most beautiful sailing yachts – and some of them more than 100 years old. Among these “old ladies” of yachting, one to watch this year include Tauga, the flagship of the Yacht Club of Monaco, Mareika, a member of the Société Nautique de Saint Tropez and Hispania, which was launched by the former King of Spain, Alfonso XIII, in 1909, and recently restored to her former glory.

These remarkable museum pieces provide a glimpse into an elegant past era of yachting and require crews who understand and respect each boat’s heritage and tradition as they race to win the prestigious Rolex trophy. They also need to compete with the best of breed today, which routinely sees My Song (a Nauta 70) and the titans of 24 metres and above in the Maxi class, based boat-builder, Luca Bassani. There are also yachts known as Wallys, made by the Monaco-based boat-builder, Luca Bassani.

“Now it has become a peak date in the calendar,” says Turcat. “It’s a chance to drink, be happy and enjoy the party atmosphere, but in a very respectful way. It’s a very different scene to the crowds and VIPS who flock to St Tropez in summer. During Les Voiles, almost everyone in town is associated with the regatta in some way. Everyone you meet in the street is wearing the uniform of their boat.”

Many others enjoy the spectacle from the surrounding hillslopes. “Even if you can’t go on the water, you can see it from all the roads around. It’s very easy to get a good view,” Turcat adds.

The on-shore social side to Les Voiles has always been as energetic and colourful as the racing. The event’s organisers call it an “exceptional alchemy”, bringing together the love of sailing with the innate pleasure of partying.

“Partying has always been a cornerstone of the regatta. De Colmont describes it as a chance for the people of St Tropez to let loose after a festive summer season, but in a way that’s authentic to them and based around a celebration of the water. “There is no commercial goal and every form of extravagance is welcome,” he says. That certainly sounds like St Trooper.

The legendary oceanographer Jacques-Yves Cousteau once said, 'The sea, once it casts its spell, holds one in its net of wonder forever'. When one stands on the hilltops of Col d’Eze, it is truly impossible to not be enchanted by the extraordinary vistas over the Mediterranean. Soaring high above the azure waters of the French Riviera and encompassed by a national park, the property sits nestled amid exquisitely manicured grounds with inviting terraces and elegant lawns.

If you are able to pull yourself away from the allure of its graceful accommodation, the magician’s hand is completely revealed. Sumptuous flora reigns over the slopes, with meandering pathways lined by fragrant roses, date palms, orange and lemon trees winding towards the picturesque village of Eze. Whilst recognizing the natural beauty of the estate, one cannot neglect its equivalent handcrafted assets including a remarkable amphitheatre, a 25m swimming pool, and an inspiring tennis court.

If you can imagine yourself sitting amongst friends and family celebrating this extraordinary home, then pinch yourself – ‘No, you’re not dreaming’. For additional information please visit www.knightfrank.com/RS140555

THERE’S A HUMAN ELEMENT IN THE WORLD OF PROPERTY THAT IS TOO EASILY OVERLOOKED.

At Knight Frank we build long-term relationships, which allow us to provide personalised, clear and considered advice on all areas of property in all key markets. We believe personal interaction is a crucial part of ensuring every client is matched to the property that suits their needs best – be it commercial or residential.

Operating in locations where our clients need us to be, we provide a worldwide service that’s locally expert and globally connected.

We believe that inspired teams naturally provide excellent and dedicated client services. Therefore, we’ve created a workplace where opinions are respected, where everyone is invited to contribute to the success of our business and where they’re rewarded for excellence. The result is that our people are more motivated, ensuring your experience with us is the best that it can be.

Our experts can help you find your dream property. Whether you’re looking to buy your first home, procure an investment property, or find a stunning property for your next move, we want to be there with you every step of the way.
